

THE MOST RIGGED ELECTION EVER

by Miles Mathis

First published November 9, 2022

Meaning, they pushed this one more points in more races nationwide than ever before. Yeah, Mike Lindell is right on both counts: they went for the big steal, right in front of our faces, and nothing will be solved until we go back to paper ballots. Even that won't help if the "clowns" such as those running the show in Maricopa County are allowed to remain in place, since they can steal paper elections, too. They did it for generations. Publius 2.0 is also right: this was all manufactured from Langley. But I remind you I am not agreeing with Lindell or Publius, they are agreeing with me. I was saying these things before anyone had heard of Publius or Lindell.

And yeah, my prediction of a red wave was wrong, though I did strongly hedge it. I think we all knew it was either/or: either a huge red wave to move everyone right, or a big obvious steal, to keep everyone off-balance and push us toward a civil war. There was nothing in between. The only thing we knew is that nothing sensible or believable would happen. I should have listened to Bill Gates, who has a better feel for how the evil ones think. I can't get in their heads. Like any sane person, I keep looking for how they can get out of this and save themselves. If I were them I would be trying to save my soul as well as my hide. But they aren't me and I am not them, thank the Muses. They have no real desire for comfort, happiness, or problem solving, even for themselves. They only have an unquenchable lust for short-term power, chaos, destruction, and lies, even if it means watching their own families and bodies crash and burn. They are drawn to the pit like a magnet.

You will say, "If they were going to steal it, why not steal it all the way, taking the House and Senate?" Because they didn't need to. By damping the red wave to a red trickle, they allow the Dems to now claim a mandate, by saying they did much better than Obama in 2010 and 2014. They can claim there is no widespread dissatisfaction, allowing them to continue on pretty much as before, while still hiding somewhat behind a plausible deniability. In other words, they stole only as much as they needed, but not enough to create a raft of martyrs. As it is, they created only a few like Bolduc and Zeldin: not enough to rally around nationwide. Those races were clearly stolen, but by margins large enough that the loser would have a hard time claiming fraud. They didn't want a nationwide rally, because that might be against the system in general, rather than just red against blue. They have to be careful to spark a civil war rather than a revolution. It is tricky, as you see, because after 2020 even many Dems were admitting the system was broken. Dems were polling at astonishingly high numbers saying the election was stolen. That kind of sentiment doesn't lead to civil war, it leads to revolution.

I am going to skip any longwinded analysis of this one, since I remind you it just doesn't matter. The Republicans weren't going to save us anyway. They might have made things a bit easier, like DeSantis has done in Florida, but beyond that nothing was going to change. Congress and Governors don't run this country and never have: they are beholden to higher powers and do what they are told. It looks like Kari Lake will come back from her strange 19 point deficit, but even so I don't expect she will do much. At best, she will act as a DeSantis for Arizona, which is not nothing. But remember, DeSantis was pro-vaccine in the crucial first year. Like Trump, he has the blood of thousands on his hands. Kari Lake will control the opposition.

I will remind you of something, though: right before the election, it wasn't just the reds predicting a huge red wave, it was the CIA's own newspaper, the Washington Post. It was the major banks. It was the Democratic National Committee (minus Pelosi). All the polls were pointing at huge House gains and a red Senate. The CIA had to have known how this would go, so it appears they were just setting you up for disappointment. They love nothing more than jerking the rug out from under you. It is job one at Langley. I had thought they were most interested in moving us right in this cycle, but as it turns out they were most interested in grinding their heel in your face, even if it meant harm to themselves. Maybe they did it just to spite me. I hope so, because if they did they just fell into my trap.

I watched votes coming in nationwide for hours, so I do have one major comment, based on that crunching of data. This election was stolen in the exact opposite way of 2020, on purpose and to stir your mind. In 2020, the red candidates went out to early and seemingly unassailable leads, leads they kept until 80 or 90%, and sometimes up to 95%. But then in the last 5 or 10%, the blue candidates suddenly surged, most of them in the wee hours of the morning while you slept. This time, to be clever, the Dems warned us beforehand they would do that again, stealing it late, possibly with mail-ins in the days following the election. They said it might take days to count the votes. So the Reps were on high alert for that. But then the opposite happened: they front-loaded the steal in the first hour of counting, and we saw blue candidates in tight races take truly astounding early leads of 20 points or more. When I first tuned in, Fetterman was up by 18, and we saw the same thing in Arizona after polls closed, with Lake and Masters being swamped in their races. Warnock was way up on Walker in the early stages, and it was the same everywhere else, with Hochul and Whitmer and so on. So where were these early votes supposed to be coming from? In Arizona, they couldn't have been coming from Maricopa, since that is where all the worst snafus were. But more to the point, why would 2022 proceed upside down to 2020, as a whole? We are in the same country with the same machines just two years later. Don't tell me Covid and mail-ins, because that doesn't come close to explaining it. Fewer mail-ins due to lower fear of infection would logically only delete the late blue surge. It would not cause an early blue tsunami nationwide. As I say, a general 20 point early surge can only be explained as a computer gift, meant to place those races out of reach of any real counting. The only reason Lake appears to be closing that gap as I write (she is now only .2 down with 66% counted) is that they appear to have miscalculated her popularity. It is pretty hard to steal a 70-30 race, and even starting Lake at 40% won't do it. Those totals may be stalled as they roll in a plan B, stealing it from her a second time in two days. No doubt they are trying to quickly manufacture a late blue surge, maybe with a pile of mail-ins discovered in a laundry hamper or something.

Here's the most telling statistic I saw in this whole cycle:

Generally speaking, do you consider yourself a Democrat, a Republican, or don't you consider yourself either? Would you say you're closer to the Democrats, to the Republicans, or don't you lean toward either?

+ Democrat/Lean Dem		43,109	43%
+ Republican/Lean Rep		40,836	49%
+ Independent		8,827	7%

Sample: 92,772 Respondents

[A reader has pointed out there is a problem in the first column there, with the numbers not supporting the percentages. FOX has not corrected it as of today, but if we look at the figures below that, we see that the percentages and bars must be right, with the numbers wrong. All the questions asked in the poll of that nature point to a huge burst in “conservatism” in the past decade. As here:]

That's a huge poll by FOX/AP, run out of the University of Chicago. As you see, it included a gigantic sampling, nearly 93,000 people. And all were polled in the past week, after Halloween. That poll by itself puts the lie to election numbers. It shows people are so dissatisfied with the Democratic Party they don't even identify with it anymore. Compare that to my paper in 2012 on the national elections, where we found that there were 86 million registered Democrats, 55 million Republicans, and 28 million registered Other. That comes out to 51% Democrat, 32% Republican, and 17% Other. With those numbers, Romney didn't have a chance against Obama, and I showed there that the numbers had to be rigged to make it look close. Even so, the electoral vote was a landslide. So with Republicans up by 6 points this time, and most Independents expected to vote non-Dem, the Reds should have had a 13 point headstart everywhere. That is a recipe for an unpreventable tsunami, if real votes are counted. You could not maintain a split Senate under those conditions. So we know something besides real votes were counted.

I have to admit I am actually happy they stole this one so conspicuously, since it was another big mistake. It will indeed drive us in the direction of a civil war, since it will further infuriate the masses. But that war will not go as planned. To make that work, they need to keep us pointed at one another. They need to create a blue and a gray, but their apparatus to achieve that is gone. With the collapse of the mainstream media their ability to herd us in that way is all but evaporated. The morale of the army is also in tatters, so they can't fall back on that in an emergency, either. They have created a huge instability in the system on purpose, Operation Chaos, which they think keeps us off balance. But that instability goes both ways, because it makes the chances very high they will lose control of the narrative at a crucial juncture, allowing a pivot point in history. If blue and gray ally against black, it is all over for the Phoenix. That is what is coming. I think they know that, but like all addicts, they can't quit.