

Another Reason to Give Birth at Home

A lawsuit in New Jersey is publicizing what was already known by some: hospitals not only draw blood from all babies without consent (or even knowledge) of parents, they store that blood and are free to do with it whatever they please, including selling it. If you think they wouldn't sell it to rich people who want to use it as an elixir, well, you are still hopelessly naive.

This ties into a previous paper of mine, where I suggested they do the same thing with blood drives in schools, where—again—there is nothing to stop your child's blood ending up in various elixirs, potions, or rituals.

This just proves once again that we are ruled over by a cabal of actual vampires, feeding upon us not just figuratively, but literally. The idea that they could legally take blood from newborns—who, presumably, are in need of their blood—is so far beyond the pale it beggars all belief. They claim that this is to screen for diseases: a flimsy excuse for vampirism if ever I heard it. Babies got born for hundreds of thousands of years without this requirement, and civilization never collapsed.

I was only at a hospital once for the birth of a friend's child, but I saw how they do this. I snooped around and quickly learned some things, as usual. They don't draw the blood while the baby is in its mother's arms, of course. She might ask questions. They surreptitiously sneak the newborns off to a separate abattoir, where they can ply their dark arts. Plus, they don't just insert a syringe. They slice the sole of the foot, a truly gruesome procedure, with the baby of course screaming in pain.

Such an advanced and compassionate society we are, to be sure.

Then don't forget the screaming circumcision and the multiple dangerous and unnecessary vaccines and the bullying nurses and the ugly rooms and the drugged up mothers (they would have to be drugged up to consent to any of this). As far as making birth a beautiful experience, you might as well have the child delivered by a checker at Walmart.

Most women choose to give birth in a hospital because they are afraid they may need an emergency Caesarian or other procedure, if all doesn't go to plan. And of course the medical industry plays up that fear, to make sure you do spend a lot of money on something that should be free. They need to get you in there to torture your newborn for fun and profit. But the dangers of home birth are vastly overrated, and I would guess they are normally less than the danger of sepsis and other problems at the hospital. Even if you do need an emergency Caesarian, you have time to get to a hospital for that. That is what they have ambulances and Starflight for.

The wife of one of my volleyball buddies in Taos had her birth botched by the local hospital, going septic, and she had to be flown all the way to Albuquerque. Everything turned out all right, but it just shows that giving birth at a hospital is no guarantee of anything.

The only smart plan at this point in history is to disconnect yourself in all ways from the government and institutional America. And that includes hospitals, pharmacies, public schools, and all other links. Go Amish. If you don't, you are sure to become another pathetic zombie in a nation of zombies, sleepwalking through life. You will end up prematurely ugly, sick, and broke, at which point your ravaged corpse will be mined for any last salvage and then burned to keep the rich warm.
