

THE MOST TERRIFYING IQ STATISTIC?

by Miles Mathis

First published April 4, 2021

In this youtube video, Jordan Peterson tells us the greatest tragedy of IQ is that ten percent of the human population is not qualified to do anything in the military. Is that the upper 10% or the lower? You may laugh, but he does take it a bit further. These people with an IQ of below 83 aren't allowed into the military because there is no task they could be assigned that they could efficiently complete there. Peterson says that means they also are basically unemployable in the greater world, which isn't strictly true, but we see his point. It is indeed a tragedy that the New World Order has no place for 10% of the population, as a matter of employment.

But although that is a big problem, it isn't anything like the most terrifying IQ statistic, or the greatest problem. Why? Because it could be solved with one stroke of the pen. Congress could meet for one day and solve it, by outlawing robots and automation in most work places. Or by outlawing certain machines on farms. Or in any number of other ways. That is where these people used to be employed. But now unskilled labor has been taken over by machines and robots. A fraction of that takeover is probably reasonable, since we don't want people doing dangerous or overly monotonous line work. We don't want to make these people slaves or drones. But we also don't want to throw them on the streets or on the dole simply so that corporations can save a few dollars, redirecting that profit to their CEOs.

I will be told there is no fighting progress and no going back. I will be told we can't just outlaw machines. But none of that is true. It clearly isn't progress, and calling it progress is just corporate propaganda. And we can go back any time we like. There is no rule of history that says we can't admit to mistakes and correct them. That is just more corporate propaganda. And we can outlaw anything we like. That is what laws are for: to keep society from spinning out of control like it is right now. So this is actually not an insoluble problem, and is therefore not really terrifying at all. It could easily be solved.

The greater problem of IQ and US employment is that modern society doesn't have many good jobs for anyone. A large fraction of work now done is work that simply doesn't need to be done. It is destructive, predatory, and unsustainable. It is work done in the production of products that should have never been invented or produced to start with. Even in food production, which would seem at first to be an exception to that, it is true, since most food now on the shelves or in the restaurants is tainted, unhealthy, and often poisoned. It is saturated with GMO oils and greases, modified beet sugar, white flour, white rice, medicated beef and chicken, and a thousand other vile things. Most food in the US isn't fit for human consumption or animal consumption. The same thing goes for the medical industry, which should be an exception to that rule, but which actually proves it as much as any other field—as this fake Covid pandemic has shown beyond any doubt. A large percentage of the medical profession and industry is fraudulent, harmful, and often lethal. It profits off human suffering by creating it and exacerbating it. Same for the fields of politics, media, intelligence, science, and academia. The universities have been completely bought out by the corporatocracy as well, and the number of decent jobs there is also approaching zero.

So you will forgive me for lobbying for my own group, but in my opinion the discarding and misuse of the upper 10% is more terrifying and tragic than the discarding of the lower 10%. And it gets worse the higher up you go. What decent jobs are available for someone like me, in the upper 1% of IQ? I have never seen or heard of a job in the American system that I wanted to have. I never even applied for any. Ever. And I am not alone. The guy with perhaps the second highest tested IQ in the US (after Marilyn vos Savant) is a guy named Chris Langan. Where do you think he works? MIT, Caltech, Harvard? No, he's a bartender. Marilyn writes and lectures, but her mainstream job is solving trivial puzzles at Parade magazine. Seems like a waste of her talent, doesn't it? But that's just my point. If you don't want to work for the military or the government, your opportunities are about nil. All the interesting creative jobs are taken by children of the billionaires, and Marilyn, being in that group, got one of the least of those jobs. Those people don't need jobs at all, being soaked in money from the cradle, but they take all the interesting jobs anyway, just to keep unfairness at maximum. But, truth be told, those jobs aren't interesting anymore anyway, and I wouldn't trade places with any of them. They have to be propaganda whores for their cousins in business and government, so as far as I am concerned, they can have all those acting, writing, and arts jobs.

For instance, fine art has been completely destroyed. In the mainstream, it doesn't exist at all. It has been replaced by Modernism, where the word "fine" has no meaning. It is all a conjob of propaganda, salesmanship, faked prices, and money laundering. No talented person is allowed in, which works out because no person of talent would be caught dead there.

Science has gone a similar route, and it is all another conjob and fraud, used to drain the treasuries. And the higher up the totem pole you go, the faker it gets. The top theorists are the emptiest husks in the field. Again, they are fronts for the billionaires, and they don't rise from the ranks, they are just planted at the top, where they make their asinine pronouncements and publish their absurd and unread books.

Which is pretty much how I got here. Unlike Chris Langan, I am not too interested in liquor or jawing with people, so bartending was no more appealing to me than military work. I cartooned for a while, and thought of following the path of Gary Larson, but even while I was doing it I felt it wasn't really my destiny. As with Marilyn at Parade, we can now see it would have been a waste of my talents, and thank God I didn't get syndicated.

But the point is, the American system did its best to waste me. Once I refused the corporate and military paths, the overlords kicked me into the ditch with at least as much disregard as they show for any sub-80 IQ person. They left the door cracked into the realist art scene, as in Santa Fe, and I crawled out of the gutter into that, but even there they owned all the galleries and had a long list of rules posted. You were expected to turn yourself into a hack as quickly as possible and paint what you were told, basically being a decorator for the tasteless. So my future was not bright there either.

And now, even after I have scratched out an independent existence for myself online, they do their best to waste me. Actually, waste is a generous term, since what they really wish to do is quash me. They want to slander me, censor me, and otherwise ignore me, I suppose in punishment for not going into the military to start with. Although there is lot of talk about thinking outside the box, innovation, free expression, and diversity, the overlords actually have zero tolerance for anyone who does not do exactly as he is told. You are free to be a tranny, that is, but if you want to be free to question mainstream science, art, literature, or history, forget it. You will wish you had a sub-80 IQ, because at least then the overlords would leave you alone with your thoughts.

This misuse of the top 10% is a far greater tragedy than the misuse or disuse of the bottom 10%. That is because the top 10%, and especially the top 1%, were destined to do far more. Given the proper opportunity and encouragement, just imagine what they might have done. I ended up doing what I did despite zero opportunity and encouragement, but that is rare. Few people are as combative as I am. I now think I did what I did because of the discouragement, and I would probably have done far less had I been coddled. I now see it as a blessing I hit low ceilings in cartooning and painting, and had all my early writings refused, both in literature and science. It pissed me off and ended up making me trade up each time. In other words, I always doubled down and risked an even greater failure or crash, by moving into an even more exclusive or prestigious field. Thrown out of the courtyard, I then stormed the castle. Thrown out of the castle, I then crashed the citadel. Thrown out of the citadel, I then crashed the inner sanctum, where I found it abandoned.

So while it worked in my case, I wouldn't recommend it as a general method of encouraging excellence. We can be sure that this discouragement most often works, and that far more research has been destroyed than sharpened by such inhospitality. For every one like me that breaks through anyway, there must thousands or millions who were successfully silenced. And even my story is not told yet. They may find some way to squelch me yet, in which case I will join the billions. That won't end it (see previous paper), but it would be a shame nonetheless.

Call me elitist, but I see the purposeful squashing and debilitating of our top end a far greater tragedy to the history of mankind than the loss of some fruit-picking or assembly-line jobs. Don't get me wrong, I think that problem should be solved in favor of the workers, with the machines scrapped, and if I were king I would make it happen immediately. But, being that we are on the cusp of a complete and total revolution in physics and all the sciences, one that will make all previous ones look like blips, our top 1% in IQ are more crucial than ever. The fact that they have been so completely dumbed-downed, controlled, and drugged, is a historical tragedy beyond compare. Just when we need those people the most, we find them shambling around with various vises on their heads, having been miseducated into a near-stupor. Our smartest people have never been stupider, and they are now clogging up those channels rather than oiling them. Honestly, our only hope is to dry out some of the youngest people, weaning them immediately off the propaganda and plugging them into heavy doses of the truth. Without them, my revolution can only move forward on a sputter, since I can hardly do everything myself.