

More Gaslighting is Afoot

by Miles Mathis

July 10, 2024

The House passed the SAVE Act today, sending it to the Senate. This would require voters to prove citizenship in order to vote.

But wait. How can something this basic just now be decided? Are you telling me the US is 250 years old and no one knows if non-citizens can vote or not? Actually, the 14th Amendment states that only citizens (natural born or naturalized) can vote. It does that in sort of a roundabout way, by stating that all natural born and naturalized persons are citizens, and that their rights of citizenship, including voting, cannot be restricted by the States. But it amounts to the same thing.

This was admitted in arguments on the House floor, where no one argued non-citizens have a Constitutional right to vote. The only question was whether they should have to prove citizenship. Democrats basically argued it was inconvenient to require citizens to prove they were citizens, and would suppress voting. The rest of the world watches this in utter disbelief.

It should be very easy to prove you are a citizen, right? And if it isn't easy, whose fault is that? The government's, obviously. It could be stamped on your Social Security card or even your driver's license. We are now tracked from cradle to grave, often by computers, cameras, drones, and satellites. NSA has a file on every person, and if they don't have a file on you, you must have just gotten off the boat. In which case you are definitely not a citizen.

You have to prove who you are to get on a plane. In fact, you have to take off your shoes, empty your pockets, and be X-rayed head to toe to get on the plane. But no one in Congress is worried about your convenience there, are they? For jury duty, you once again have to prove who you are and pass security. So why should you be able to demand a ballot with nothing but a heartbeat? Voting is your number one civic duty, being about the only civic duty of most people, and yet it is treated with all the respect and solemnity of blowing your nose. It tells you exactly how seriously the governors take it. Why should THEY be inconvenienced confirming your identity when they are just going to throw your votes in the shredder anyway? Do you really think the computers are storing and counting your votes? No, they are sending those direct to spam. So all this debate about voter ID is just more misdirection. It is voting theater.

In truth, the government already knows if you are a citizen. It already knows where you work, where you live, where you shop, where you bank, where you went to kindergarten, your shoe size, and your porn habits. But I guess the Democrats want us to believe the voter rolls aren't hooked up to the main computers, just being stored on a old rolodex. If they feign enough ignorance and incompetence, they can claim innocence when millions of non-citizens just accidentally get sent ballots and send them in and they accidentally get counted.

It should be an embarrassment that this sort of stuff gets voted on in Congress at all. Don't these people have jobs? Aren't there some real problems they need to be solving? This should have been set in stone in 1776, a month after founding, and the fact it is still being debated just shows the world what a bunch of flibbers we really are. In a country run and inhabited by honest people, this would never happen. But of course you could say that about everything allegedly happening now. It is all scripted for maximum chaos, since only in maximum chaos can the dishonest thrive.

This is proof enough by itself that elections are being and will continue to be stolen. I guess the only question remaining is whether the powers that be will steal an election for a candidate with less than 10% approval. We know they can, but as George Bush I used to say, "Wouldn't be prudent." That has never stopped them before, though. Prudence is not a known long suit of the Phoenicians. But pyromania is.