

Horror in Arizona?

One of the top stories at GatewayPundit today is about Natives in Arizona kidnapped by white vans and taken to fake medical facilities, where they were heavily drugged and used to defraud Medicaid of at least $12 billion. Hmm. Where those white vans ambulances, by any chance, and were the fake medical facilities hospitals? Because this just sounds like business as usual in the US. This is the model used by mainstream healthcare, for people of all colors, and I can't believe anyone can read this article and not see the parallels.

New whistleblower allegations claim vulnerable Native Americans were allegedly lured into white vans with promises of treatment, then plied with fentanyl, methamphetamine, alcohol, and other drugs before being imprisoned inside fake behavioral health homes where operators allegedly billed Medicaid for months of fraudulent “treatment.”

Other than the alcohol onboard the van, you could say that about a large fraction of the current healthcare system, which preys on the vulnerable, capturing them into a system of addiction, sometimes by shooting them up with fentanyl on ambulances when they are picked up from accidents (this was recently admitted and I wrote about it, remember), and then imprisoning them in hospitals which will not release them to relatives and which run tests and other procedures without authorization. Once in this “hospital”, they are then plied with more dangerous drugs and strapped into a system of fake care, all of it billed to Medicaid or Medicare. Very few are helped and many are harmed further, some of them dying there after long, expensive, and torturous treatment. I have seen this with my own eyes with friends and relatives. You probably have, too.

You have seen it recently in the Lindsay Clancy case, the nurse who was prescribed 13 dangerous drugs by her psychiatrist for postpartum depression, had a breakdown, and killed her children. I'm not sure why a nurse would agree to combine all these dangerous drugs, or to take any of them. She should have known better. Same with the doctor in this story, Danice Hertz, who took one dose of the Pfizer vaccine and was nearly killed by it. Should have known better. But these things happen. Hertz was probably threatened with loss of her license if she didn't take it, like many. Millions were killed and injured by the vaccines and it has mostly been covered up at the behest of Big Pharma, which buried all reporting and research.

So change the title to “Horror in the mainstream US healthcare system . . . which has recently begun preying on reservations in the same way, after preying on them in all ways for 150 years”.
