

VIVE LA REVOLUTION

by Miles Mathis

October 5, 2026

As you may know, highschool students in France are currently in a state of revolution*, with 400 schools closed and several burned, mostly in the area of Paris. Conservative sites in the US are all against it, as you are about to see, so I am going against the grain with this one. Although I still doggedly call myself a liberal, most of my readers consider me a conservative, and I am indeed in agreement with many so-called conservative tenets these days, as you know, especially on the social side. I often argue the Christian side and am a staunch supporter of tradition in many cases, being perhaps the fiercest critic of Modernism (especially in art) who ever lived. But on this subject, I am with the young “brats”. I would have to be since I have called for this revolution myself, and hope it comes to the US. I have said that the revolution may start with the youth, in just this way, with highschoolers saying enough is enough. Only the fact they have been drugged into submission has delayed this revolution so far.

Why would I say that? Many reasons, but perhaps reason number one is now “active shooter drills”, which is the excuse for DHS goons—in cohorts with local blackshirts—to infiltrate the schools, terrorize the children, and prepare them for fake mass shootings, staged by DHS, CIA, Air Force, or some other entity. Doesn't really matter who is doing it, the problem is it is being done and parents are letting it happen. I just saw a video of Dave Chapelle joking about it the other day. He brought it up, and—given that he sells himself as some sort of revolutionary or gadfly in the tradition of George Carlin—I expected him to say he pulled his kids out of school rather than have to take part in that propaganda. But he didn't. He laughed and said he told his kids that if there was a school shooting, they would be the first ones taken, since he was rich and famous and they had a target on their backs. WHAT! That not only isn't funny, it is criminal. Add him to the list of those who should be arrested for terrorizing their own children with these fake projects.

If you are prone to believe the “conservative” talking point that French kids are just spoiled leftists acting out (same thing they said about the hippies in the US, back to the 1960s), you may want to take a look at this article from Rachel Marsden at RT that came out today. I saw it at Infowars, now AlexJonesLive. It is just awful and you won't want to be on her side. Or I don't. Rachel starts out with a flurry of ad homs, calling the children brats, hoodlums and hooligans, before finally claiming to look at their complaints.

First, they say that they don't like long school days that stretch from 8 AM to 6 PM, with a two-hour lunch. Boy, do I have bad news for you when it comes to what awaits you in the real world. Apparently, it isn't enough that they also get two weeks of vacation every six weeks throughout the entire school year, plus the two-month summer break to enjoy taxpayer-subsidized vacations. Or that they spend much of their school day already being bussed around to various activities.

The dismissive tone there is really irritating, isn't it? French schools do not have 2-hour lunches (it's usually closer to 1.5), but they are in school until 6pm, which is of course penal. In the US, children are only in school/jail from about 8:30 to 3:30, which is bad enough. Seven hours of propaganda being forced down their little throats under fluorescent lights. But in France that is 9.5 hours, much longer than most adults spend at work. Over 47 hours per week being cooped up indoors, being lied to by creepy adults about history, art, politics, science, and everything else. When do they get any sun? I guess they get a 30-minute recess, where they can walk in circles in the courtyard after nurses have slathered them with sunscreen.

Same for the two-month summer break, which of course used to be three. It was three when I was a kid. And how is a summer break for children “taxpayer subsidized”? Does it cost more to have children playing in the yard or running in the park than to have them in school? How does that work? Doesn't sound like something a “Rachel” would say: I am smelling AI here, which as usual I want to punch in the face.

And notice “Rachel” says bussing kids to the museum is just spoiling them. Yes, by all means, lockdown the little snits, preferably in solitary, for their own good, so that they know how the real world works. But it gets worse:

They say that their schools aren't up to snuff. And sometimes there isn't even toilet paper in the stalls, they cry. Does the state have to wipe your behinds, too?

That's about as funny as Dave Chappelle terrorizing his own children. What kind of little ingrates would expect toilet paper in the stalls? Those working in the Bourse (bankers) don't have toilet paper: they re-use stale baguettes or crullers. The tougher ones just use their hands.

They also complain of poor facilities. Like not enough air conditioning. That's less of a “problem” than a deliberate ideological choice championed by the same comrades with whom these kids are happily associating themselves on the far left in order to make it look like the leftists’ annual September freakout is actually effective this year.

So these children aren't just hooligans and ingrates, they are far-left nutjobs. Conservative children have no need for toilet paper or air conditioning or teachers and they love staying in school until dark. They just wish they could stay in school 24 hours, to further practice all the salutes and goosesteps.

Take that one up with them. They’re the ones who want you to sweat it out for the planet and get angry when any money is spent on air cooling. At least until you die from heat exhaustion and can then finally enjoy some industrial-grade post-mortem cold storage whose carbon footprint you’ll be offsetting by not breathing carbon dioxide into the air.

That's what I mean by AI. “Rachel” just went rogue there: unless this was mistranslated from French or Russian, her neural networks just misfired. That makes no sense. It is impossible to even guess what “she” intended.

I note that Rachel implies France spends way too much money on education already. Is that true? Of course not. Like the US, France spends far more on “defense”, and Trump has demanded all European countries increase defense spending to 5% of GDP. The US spends about 20 times more per capita on defense than China, which means we could cut our spending by 90% and still easily keep China and Russia at bay. Which would give us $900 billion more to spend on education and other things. We could double that if we quit fattening the bankers every year with fake treasury debt. To a lesser extent, that applies to all Western countries like France, who piss away a large fraction of taxes to make the very rich even richer, while all other sectors languish. You should have no problem believing schools in France suck, since they suck here even worse, while we are far richer. Our schools are far MORE like jails than theirs, with many students in California and elsewhere only getting 15 minutes for lunch. And that lunch is something like really bad pizza, hamburger, or other nearly inedible slop. About the only good thing about schools in the US is that they don't (yet) continue on to 6pm.

If you are a parent, you know that, or should, but if you don't, go down and watch the “spoiled darlings” exiting the school on any given day. Do they look sleek and pampered, bursting with health, confidence, and swagger? No, they look like they just came out of rehearsal for Mad Max 4, with cracking fingernails and dark circles under their eyes. They are shuffling along like beaten dogs, dressed all in black, with the boys barely keeping their pants up and the girls looking like Jodi Foster in Taxi Driver. Everyone whose parents can afford it is already in therapy, and those that can't are strung out on multiple drugs as therapy. They aren't on drugs to misbehave or because they are hooligans, they are on drugs for the same reason you are: to cope with the PTSD that threatens to destroy them by the time they are 12, all caused by the ghoulish culture Rachel seems to be defending here. A culture that crushes us all on purpose with 24/7 fake events, psyops, gaslighting, and brainwashing. How could anyone NOT cheer a prison break from that? We should all go down to the school and help them burn it to the ground.

Or, even better, we should skip that and burn down the entire military/industrial complex, using the money saved from that to retool the schools into real centers of enlightenment, knowledge, creativity, and health. You will say nobody can even imagine what that would be like anymore. The old people can, since although schools weren't great in the old days, they were an idyll compared to now. No active shooter drills for a start. There was military propaganda, but nothing like what came after the First Gulf War in 1990, with the yellow ribbons and all that claptrap. Almost no politics in school, other than the occasional announcement. In English you actually learned English. In history you actually learned history, or what passed for it back then. Yes, all that history was tainted, but it was tainted only by its original taint, not by a heavy new frosting added by the CIA and DHS. There were no phones or computers to give the propagandists 24/7 access to your mind. Teachers taught from textbooks that hadn't changed in decades, not from Newspeak workbooks of sexual obliteration. Boys were boys and girls were girls, and most were happy with that. Those that weren't could do their own thing after school, without throwing it in everyone else's faces and demanding applause.

We need to go back to that and rebuild from there, correcting the things that were wrong even then, starting with the food, which—though not as bad as now—was pretty horrible. Next by finding a way to get more sunshine on the children, with skylights, large windows, courtyards as classrooms in good weather, MORE field trips and walking tours, and so on. Next by banning phones, computers, wifi, and teaching children to write again, with their hands. This will wake up parts of their brains they didn't even know they had, making them smarter off the top. Next by bringing back books. Children were smarter in the time of the McGuffey Reader than they are now. The only thing kids know now is pop trivia: sports and music and cinema and internet stars. And the governors love it like that. It was no accident. All that needs to go away, with school being about the old 3 R's: reading, writing and arithmetic, reading including history and arithmetic including science. Plus of course music and art. With a return to traditional music and art, throwing Modernism out with the computers and phones. This is how you create real human beings, instead the zombies now being produced by our schools, obese morons too stupid to go into the army, much less anywhere else. The sort of zombies like Rachel, who use AI to create their illegible articles for the press.

You will say, “That may be so, but getting back to France, this does look a lot like a continuation of Project Chaos, and it IS being used by the left in France to continue distractions and explode society in its own way”. Yes, and it may even be provocateured to some extent. The picture under title, for instance, is AI, and I confirm that. But I am still in favor of the protests, since it is cases just like this that spin out of control, turning astroturfed chaos into real revolution. I have warned Intel before that they are playing with fire here, and that if they want Chaos, Loki is likely to give it them, in a form they didn't predict. If worldwide Intel were smart, they would be backing out of Project Chaos with all possible speed, not as a favor to us, but to avert their own crash.

Plus, this is just how they would try to cover up the start of a real Revolution: they would blackwash the revolutionaries with a load of ad homs, then try to lump them in with some hated group or another, exactly as Rachel did here. And while they were doing that, they would be psychologically imploding themselves, their writing turning into gibberish as they wrote, I guess from fear of their own created vortex.

*Millions are also on the streets in Spain, and they are hiding the real reason, we being told it is in support of one old woman who died in the suburbs or something.
