

More Fauxtos

This is one of the worst current pastes I have seen in a while. I found it leading an article at The Gateway Pundit on the Supreme Court's recent decision on issuing drivers licenses to illegal immigrants. The Court declined to hear the case of California and Washington doing that, but that isn't the question here. The question is that photo, said to be Indian commercial truck driver Harjinder Singh. He doesn't look very Indian, does he? That's because the photo is a raw composite. Anyone can see they have pasted one face over another face, with the seam showing on his forehead, most obviously above his eye to your left. They didn't even bother to match the skintone, with the guy underneath being whiter and the guy on top being redder. But it's even worse than that, because a different nose is pasted on as well, from some third party. See how it goes to your left, as if he is looking slightly left when he isn't. Then the eyes are wrong as well, since one is just the reverse of the other. They match up too well. The neck is also ridiculous, since the lines coming down are dead straight, and the line to your right is a thick black line. This is a disaster. Hard to believe AI would be so sloppy, except that AI has been trained to think we are blind idiots, since that is what its programmers think.

To be clear, this is not the fault of Gateway Pundit, they are just republishing a mainstream story from the wires here, using a mainstream fake photo, as you see from the byline: St. Lucie County Sheriff's Office. I don't believe for a second that comes from a local Sheriff's office. More likely to be a CIA production.

So what can we tell from this? Well, it is proof of what I have already told you: most or all of these truck crashes reported over the past couple of years are faked in order support the current agenda of deporting of illegal immigrants. This is the way it is done, and not only on this issue. Everything the government decides to do is supported by CIA and the other agencies in this way, with many events faked to back it up and try to generate public support. I don't know why they still bother, since they are going to do whatever they are doing with or without our support, and they can report support even when it doesn't exist. But this has been part of the workload of the Intel agencies for decades or centuries, so they wouldn't dream of dialing it back now. They are going to do it and bill it to the treasury whether it is necessary or not.

And in other news, the internet went wild claiming Vice Admiral Robert Hayward was wearing a full-head mask during his interview with Fox News. You can see why, since that line makes no sense. Proves not everyone is blind, right? Yes, but the probable explanation is not a mask, but an AI youth filter, to make him look younger. It erased most of the lines on his face and neck, but due to a computer glitch ended above his collar. This is a vanity filter, like the one used by Vanessa Trump last week and several times before to look like she is still in her 20s.

I am told they have these that work real time, like autotune, and you can put them on your phone to make your Facetime feed look less gruesome. Makes some sense there, since Facetime does make you look far worse than you actually look, I am not sure why. Many people refuse to use it for that reason. But of course a logical correction would take you back to how you actually look, not how you looked when you were 25.

And now to close on something truly inspirational:

Life Surge is a faith-driven movement that empowers people to thrive in business, investing. . .

Yes, just like Jesus. If I remember my scripture, Jesus was all about business and investing.
