Several photos to hit today, starting with that one of fake murderer of the moment Luigi Mangione. So nice to see New York is dressing its prisoners in cashmere sweaters, chinos, and Gucci fashion loafers, instead of prison jumpsuits or other gauche attire. I also like the zip-tie handcuffs attached to a bicycle chain. That's novel.

Speaking of fake prisoners:

That's Qanon shaman Jacob Chansley, who is “out” now and giving interviews. He has traded in his buffalo horns for a chief's headdress—which looks double-extra stupid with a blue blazer and polka dot tie. Let's hope the ghost of Geronimo gets him. He seems to have eaten well in “prison”, since he is fat now. Also note the pyramid on his hand. He is covered in Phoenician ink, having three more pyramids/deltas on his chest and various other clues to his real status. I have already outed him as Navy and Hollywood as well as being an Angeli, a Gabbard, a Lyon, and a Bolzano, probably linking him to Tulsi Gabbard and possibly linking him to the King of England, who is a Lyon. All the proof you need January 6 was staged, but if you need more, go here.

Next we have that photo from the German Christmas market fake. Notice all the other people milling around as if nothing has happened. 235 people were just mowed down by a car and the rest of these people go on with their business, continuing to shop and order bratwurst? I love the lady vendor in yellow. A guy is dying at her feet but she has to check her messages.

Next we find this:

What are the odds that 3 teenage friends grow up to lead 3 countries?

Wow, those are some scary girls, hunh? Looks like a casting call for The Ring. Which one of those young ladies just crawled out of the television? You may wonder how they all got photographed together at that age, since they are from different countries. Well, I am here to tell you. Angela Merkel comes from Hamburg, maiden name Kasner, which was originally Kazmierczak. Polish, but also Jewish. Her mother is a Jentzsch and a Drange. She allegedly studied physics in Leipzig, where she was a Stasi asset. She admits to being recruited by Stasi, but says she declined to work for them. Not believable, given the rest of her career. She then (allegedly) got a doctorate in chemistry in Berlin, where she was Secretary for Agitation and Propaganda in the local Communist Party. While still a postdoc she was appointed spokeswoman of the new Democratic Beginning Party in 1990 by its head Wolfgang Schnur. It is now admitted he was Stasi, confirming she was also. At the same time she was elected to the Bundestag as a protege of the major criminal Gunther Krause. But since this was 1990, we have a big gap in her bio. She was by then 36, very old to be a postdoc. We are told it took six years to get her undergrad degree, but not told why, since she allegedly graduated highschool top of her class. It took another eight years to get her doctorate and she allegedly remained in school after that for another four. So she was obviously doing something else during those years, and we can be sure it had to do with German Intelligence.

Theresa May, nee Brasier, is two years younger, born in Eastbourne. Her mother is Zaidee Barnes. May got a second in geography from Oxford and went to work for Bank of England at age 21. So she either graduated early or her bio is the usual fake. She is said to have worked at APACS (payment clearing) for twelve years, but that now looks like a cover to me. At age 41 she finally made it to Parliament from Maidenhead, which is strange because she had no qualifications other than being a councillor for Merton. But somehow, just five years later she became the first female Chairman of the Conservative Party, at age 46. The very next year she was shadow Secretary of State. Why? Nobody knows. Maybe it was her blonde hair. Or maybe it was because at age 24 she married Sir Philip May, a rich banker since named in the Panama Papers. They were introduced to one another by Benazir Bhutto, again telling us who we are dealing with here. May is now (2024) a Baroness, though we have no idea why. She was given this life peerage by King Charles for some service to empire, though being a failed Prime Minister is normally not cause for being raised to Baroness. May is now House of Lords.

Some clue may be gleaned by looking at the Brasiers in the peerage, where they are related to the Mores, Earls of Mountcashell. Their main line is now the Brasier-Creaghs and Brazier-Creaghs, which may be May's full maiden name. They are related to the MacGregors, the Olivers, the Bywaters, and the Beresfords. Also the Brownlows, Barons Lurgen. And through them to the Cavendishes and Lyons (who we saw above with Jacob Chansley). So that may be our answer, since the King is a Lyon.

Neville Sherlock Brazier-Creagh of the peerage may therefore be a great uncle of Theresa May, and he was a major in Intelligence, living until 1999.

With more inspired digging, we find these Brazier-Creaghs married the Herchkovitzes in the 20th century as well. Another admittedly Jewish name, see current designer Alexandre Herchcovitch.

We can also look at the Barnes in the peerage, since May's mother was a Barnes. Zaidee's mother was a Welland and her mother was a Nash or Naish. Nash is a Jewish name, so we have the usual here. But we already knew that, since Zaidee means princess in Hebrew. It is the especially Jewish spelling of Sadie. These Nashes come from Stanton StBernard in Wiltshire, so they may have had some connection to Lydiard Park in Devizes. If so we should try to connect these families to the St. Johns. As for the Barnes, one of the most interesting lines in the peerage is that of Ernest Barnes, who seems to come out of nowhere in about 1900 to become both a scientist and a bishop. His son was then knighted and his granddaughter married the Baron Sassoon, whose mother was a Schiff. So gigantic wealth on both sides. Ernest Barnes' mother was a Kerry, and the Kerrys in the peerage are related to the Olivers (see Jacqueline Nola Kerry), which links us back to the Brasiers (see previous paragraph). This would confirm that Theresa May was born peerage through her mother. It would also explain why Darryl Lundy at thepeerage.com has scrubbed all his Kerrys. We have no idea why they are listed. See for one example Frederick Charles Kerry, who married Gladys Freeman in the 1940s. Gladys (obviously Jewish) divorced Kerry to marry Mowbray Gordon Howard, Earl of Effingham, becoming the Countess Effingham, so we know she was somebody. And yet no parents are listed for Kerry. In 1915 another Kerry married extremely well, see Gertrude Kerry who married the son of Maj. Gen. Eustace and Marina Stewart. Eustace's father was a Drummond and his father-in-law was Field Marshal Sir Donald Stewart, 1st Baronet. Best guess is the Kerrys are related to the Earls of Kerry, which would make them Petty-FitzMaurices, related to the Crichton-Stuarts. I also remind you of John Kerry, Jewish, whose name was fudged from Kohn to Kerry. He was also a Forbes, linking us to all these peerage names we just looked at, including the Stuarts. So all the Kerrys in the peerage may be Kohens as well.

But let's finish off that Ernest Barnes character before summing up. Barnes took 14 years to get his doctorate (ScD) at Cambridge, so we have the usual gaps in the bio. He was Trinity College, already signaling a spook, became a Fellow in his fifth year and a junior dean in his twelfth year, before earning his doctorate. In his ninth year he was appointed Deacon by the Bishop of London, which seems very suspicious, and was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society one year after his doctorate, which seems even more suspicious. Why would he be appointed to anything by the Bishop of London, who wasn't bishop in Cambridge, and Barnes wasn't a student of divinity. His ScD was in math. He then quit his career in math after just seven years when he was appointed Master of the Temple of London by the King. Why? No one knows. Three years later he was Canon of Westminster Abbey, and then he became Bishop of Birmingham. All this for a mathematician! Finally, we find out what this was all about: as a ranking clergyman, Barnes was the most "liberal" theologian of his day, meaning the most anti-Christian. He attacked every tenet and person of the faith, including the Virgin Mary, St. Francis, and the resurrection itself. He was universally reviled, for that and later for his pushing of eugenics. He may have been related to the Barnes of Devon, big bankers related to the Carnegies. Those Barnes were also active at Trinity College. His wife was a Ward, daughter of Sir Adolphus Ward, which may explain some of Barnes' preference. This probably links us to the Ward baronets, who married the Guggenheims, Melvilles, and Bowies. Being from Birmingham, Barnes was also probably related to the Wards, Earls of Dudley from Birmingham. The 2nd Earl was Privy Counsellor during the rise of Barnes.

So what does that all have to do with May and Merkel being childhood friends? Actually, nothing, since they (probably) weren't. That photo is mistagged online. It is Merkel but the other two girls are just her friends. The girl in the middle is no match to May, which is why she doesn't look two years younger. But it was a great lead-in to my uncloaking of both May and Merkel as the usual crypto-Jews or Phoenicians, just pretending to be Christians of some sort. So although they were probably not hanging out together as schoolgirls in Hamburg or Eastbourne, they are likely cousins nonetheless, meaning the posted photo is not completely wrong. It is telling you a truth and hiding it behind a lie.

Remember, the peerage lines of England and Germany are closely linked, all the way up to the Kings and all the way down as well, all of them sharing the same Phoenician/Jewish roots that go back to the Jagiellons, the Comnenes, and even earlier. As far as the kings and dukes go, they admit it. The Windsors are really Saxe-Gotha-Coburgs from Saxony. All the European royalty are close cousins and have been for at least two millennia, and the relationships are just as close now as ever. In the 20th century the Kings, Queens, and dukes of Denmark, England, Germany, Austria, Russia, Norway, Sweden, Poland, France, and Spain, and Italy were all close cousins, sometimes 1st or 2nd cousins. So finding that Prime Ministers are also related shouldn't shock you. It should only shock you if they weren't. It would be a first.

January 9, 2025: So, barely two weeks in, with a fake trial still months in the future, I assume, and yet Tubi has already released an hour-long documentary on Mangione. Wow, that's a quick production, eh?

Tack-on. I heard this week from John Hutchison and his wife, of the Hutchison Effect fame. They want me to be involved in a new project with them. They claim to have made contact with the spirit of Ken Shoulders, who is apparently telling them my charge field is right. I said no thanks. Sounds like a standard blackwash by association to me. Places like Rational Wiki would love it if they could tie me to such things.
